What We Cover

To write about sustainability is to examine the interconnectedness of people, planet, profit, and purpose.

We are always looking for new perspectives with on-the-ground experience or thought-provoking insights, particularly those relevant to the Filipino audience. We publish news articles, features, profiles, op-eds, and case studies.

Climate Justice

Stories from those on the frontlines of the climate crisis who are fighting for accountability. We're interested in pieces that center Filipino experiences—particularly those demanding action or navigating the impacts of extreme weather, rising seas, and environmental degradation.

Protected Areas

Stories about places we need to protect and who governs them. We welcome perspectives from environmentalists, land rights advocates, Indigenous leaders, and those working at the intersection of conservation and sustainable development.

Profit & Purpose

Stories about how businesses are (or aren't) responding to the sustainability imperative. Let's talk about circular economy models, green finance and technology, and the tension between growth and responsibility in the Philippine market.

The Common Good

Stories about social equity, community-led solutions, and inclusive development. We focus on initiatives addressing localized challenges—from food security to public health—with an eye toward what's working, what's not, and who's being left behind.

Fringe Ecology

Stories and new research about biodiversity, species discovery, or anything that reveals a truth about our world. We love interesting small-scale studies that reveal big truths.

How to Pitch

Email editor@sustina.earth or the editor you hope to reach (our email addresses are available on our website). We'd appreciate a short description of your pitch and who you are. Let us know what you find interesting about it and why you are the right person to write about it.
